(9 comments) I was wondering what possible reasons could have caused someone to enable iCloud Activation Lock on my iPhone 6S. A few days ago I received a call from Verizon, where a man informed me that the iCloud activation on my iPhone was "tied" to a new user and that I should call back in the next few hours (yes, they started this process on a Friday). As I had been on vacation for the last week, I wasn't expecting to get a call until this Monday, and I couldn't even recall signing in on my new iPhone. So, I called back to Verizon that day to find out how they were able to identify my iCloud was linked to a new user, but couldn't retrieve my details that they were asking. When I asked what information they need from my old iPhone, they suggested that I send them the serial number of my old iPhone by email. So I went home, got the serial number from my old iPhone, and sent it to Verizon the following day. They told me that they had been able to retrieve the serial number from my old iPhone as they could match the serial number with the one that they have in their database and then authenticate that the original owner was still alive. My question is...how did they match my serial number with the one from my old iPhone? Also, what is it that they were able to authenticate?
